

It's an American right. It's always been that way.

You have the right to join an airline union, to ask others to join, to attend airline union meetings, to ask others to attend, to wear an airline union pin on the job, so long as it does not carry a controversial slogan, or violate company policy or uniform requirements, to hand out airline union leaflets, on your own time, to assist in, and encourage others to support, an airline union, so long as your efforts don't interfere with your work or violate posted company policy.
